

No-Free-Lunch in optimization

Solution:

In optimization, the No-Free-Lunch theorem essentially says that no single algorithm can outperform every other algorithm on all possible problems. In other words, If you average performance over every conceivable objective function, all optimization methods end up having the same overall success rate — so a method that excels in one class of problems must pay for it by performing worse on others.